ETFs are traded like stocks and are subject to fluctuations in market value and to the risks of their underlying investments. Investment income and the nominal value of an investment are subject to fluctuations in value, meaning that shares may be worth more or less at the time of sale or redemption than at the time of purchase. Although shares can be bought or sold on a stock exchange, they cannot be redeemed individually from the fund. Investors have the option to acquire shares and offer them for redemption through the fund in the form of large "creation units". Please refer to the fund prospectus for further details.

Investing in foreign securities may involve the risk of a reduction in capital due to adverse currency fluctuations, withholding taxes, differences in generally accepted accounting principles and also due to economic or political instabilities in other countries. Emerging market investments may be more volatile or less liquid than developed market investments and may involve exposure to economic structures that are generally less diverse and mature, and to political systems that are less stable than those in developed markets.

Equity securities are subject to fluctuations in value that may be caused by the activity of individual companies, fundamental market conditions or the general economic environment.

Investing in small or mid-cap companies can involve more risk than investing in better-known, large-cap companies.
